The seminar series explores perspectives of well-being and urban prosperity rooted in urban ecologies, described within the limits of existing resources. From the logics of the body, it initiates a critical dialogue with the multiple and widespread forms of heritage that make up the contemporary city.

In accordance with the participatory approach proposed by the Faro Convention, cultural heritage is thus understood as performative and co-evolutionary matter. In this view, the practice of commoning emerges as a central node to prefigure preventative models of urban well-being and care.
